

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in Kentucky

- Working women in Kentucky are farther along the road to equal pay than women in many states; in 2000, Kentucky's working women earned 78 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. Kentucky ranked 22nd among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing Kentucky's hourly wage gap was better than average in the 1990s. Kentucky ranked ninth among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Slow wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in Kentucky grew by only 6.9 percent over the decade, compared with 17.9 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in Kentucky won't have equal pay until 2026. Nationwide, women won't achieve equal pay until after 2050.
