

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in Massachusetts

- Working women in Massachusetts are farther along the road to equal pay than women in many states; in 2000, Massachusetts' working women earned 79.9 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned only 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. Massachusetts ranked 15th among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing Massachusetts' hourly wage gap was slower than average in the 1990s. Massachusetts ranked 41st among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Negative wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in Massachusetts declined by 0.3 percent over the decade, compared with 4.1 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in Massachusetts—as well as working women nationwide—won't have equal pay until after 2050.
