

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in North Carolina

- Working women in North Carolina are farther along the road to equal pay than women in many states; in 2000, North Carolina's working women earned 81.2 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned only 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. North Carolina ranked ninth among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing North Carolina's hourly wage gap was slower than average in the 1990s. North Carolina ranked 40th among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Slower wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in North Carolina grew by 12 percent over the decade, compared with 17.2 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in North Carolina won't have equal pay until 2048. Nationwide, women won't achieve equal pay until after 2050.
