

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in New York

- Working women in New York are farther along the road to equal pay than women in many states; in 2000, New York's working women earned 80.1 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned only 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. New York ranked 13th among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing New York's hourly wage gap was slower than average in the 1990s. New York ranked 36th among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Negative wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in New York declined by 2.5 percent over the decade, compared with 2.3 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in New York—as well as working women nationwide—won't have equal pay until after 2050.
