

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in Wisconsin

- Working women in Wisconsin are not as far along the road to equal pay as women in many states; in 2000, Wisconsin's working women earned 75.8 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned only 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. Wisconsin ranked 35th among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing Wisconsin's hourly wage gap was better than average in the 1990s. Wisconsin ranked fourth among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Slow wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in Wisconsin grew by only 3.8 percent over the decade, compared with 16.1 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in Wisconsin won't have equal pay until 2025. Nationwide, women won't achieve equal pay until after 2050.
